

AGENDA

Welcome to Broadsheet 15, in tandem with the 'Hoofmarks' issue of Agenda (Vol 45, No 3).

As the great classical master of equestrian art, Nuno Oliveira (who also has a passion for Opera – a 'Poetry and Opera' issue of Agenda is planned for next year), says: 'Sadly enough, this art is fugitive, as once the horse is dead, nothing, not even films, can reproduce the sensation felt when the horse is seen in movement. Death eradicates all the work of the artist, unlike musical scores or paintings (or poems) which live on to lend immortality to their creator. After the horse is no more, only those who have admired him keep a remembrance of his quality in their hearts, which is gradually effaced by Time; and others who have not seen him know him only by romanticised tales, recounted – and sometimes embroidered – by those who have truly loved him'.

Emma Cookson: White Horse, oil on canvas

Emma Cookson is the daughter of William Cookson, founding editor of Agenda who died in January 2003. Emma did this painting when she was twelve years old in 2000. She is now a graduate of Exeter University and still loves horses.

David Owen, 23, has just started an English PhD at the University of Winchester after gaining his Bachelors and Masters degrees in Creative Writing. He currently lives in Penge, a south-eastern suburb of London, where he is working on his first novel. He was previously featured in Broadsheet 11.

Musical Chairs

When the phone rang before school
to render the news

I stepped back into those amorphous summers spent at the house, the days of commemorative tins that emerged from the side cupboard to honour the passing of lunch.

Domino chains of bourbon biscuits.
French Fancies like an iris of Ludo men.

I sought distraction in the furniture shop at the end of the road,

lingered in the showroom kitchens and wished I had left my expectant hand
above the perennial virtues of cake, stalled the inevitable growth out of those summers,
the news of her death.

Slowly I moved between the armchairs, the empty displays of sofas and suites that belonged to no one,

an unspoken game of musical chairs.

Penge Panther

It's just past midnight and someone has spotted the panther.

Finally, after weeks
of paw prints in the garden,
spurned offerings of Whiskas,
we can rouse the dogs
and bait them on their leads,

check the batteries in the camera,
scramble the torches
from under the stairs.

We see a tail on every shadow amongst the lamp posts
until enough bedroom lights blink up to expose them like bonfires at a witch hunt.

We put the dogs ahead of us,
(as if they'd stand a chance) and turn onto the allotment path.

Even the police are out,
the purr of a helicopter
lingering overhead, a shred of paper spiralling on the breeze.

Its searchlight startles
the foxes, steeps the greenhouses in the splendour of ghosts.

But it's us that finds it first,
tinderbox eyes in the torchlight brooding on the alien landscape of carrots, the irregular broken stems of bean poles.

For years after we will hush our children at the noise in the garden, press our faces to the window.

Off the Edges

The snow is enough now to douse my footprints, blend the path into the field, only the spit and crackle of the electric fence to honour the divide.

Wire and nettles are frozen in coils.

I have met a horse and I envy his coat, snow piling on his back like ash.

The dogged whiteness is effacing our existence, apparitions in static between television channels.

I build a snowman on the horse's back to guide him through the night.

Tony O'Connor: Melancholy

Tony was born in Moyvane, Co. Kerry, Ireland in 1977. He studied Fine Art at Crawford College of Art and Design in Cork. In 2003 he founded White Tree Studio from where he now works, specialising in equine art. To Tony, the horse is already perfect in nature. He just tries to do justice to that absolute quality and majesty of the horse in his paintings. His work can be found in the Greenlane Gallery, Dingle, Co Kerry, Ireland. www.greenlanegallery.com

Lucy Sixsmith, 23, grew up in Bath where she now lives. She is part of a vibrant local church. She is an MA student at Bath Spa University, taught by Tim Liardet whose poems appear in the 'Hoofmarks' issue of Agenda and whose collection, Priest Skear, is reviewed there by Patricia McCarthy. As an undergraduate she read English at Trinity College, Cambridge.

Archaeology

Here is a simplified history of the Enigma cipher: Scherbius made it, Schmidt sold it, the Biuro Szyfrów broke into it, and Bletchley Park followed them in and stomped around smashing things.

I. Arthur Scherbius

The man who invented invisible ink.
The man who put locks on another man's doors.

He couldn't have known what was done with the ink or what was said behind the doors.

There's no harm in invisible ink.
There's no harm in locking doors.

There's no harm in a galloping horse—

II. Hans-Thilo Schmidt

Opulence, and a fat cigar
at the Grand Hotel in Verviers;
the manuals to photograph;
a sense of having been betrayed.

The envelope his children found,
his holidays, his flannel suits.
His soldier-son on the Russian front, their country's cause. His son's wound.

April Fool's Day, '43:
a mattress, gutted; a ransacked flat.
The hernia they would not treat.
The prison that kept his daughter out.

The scorn of both the Church and State.
"Forget everything bad about me."
His trying to be brave, be brave.
A journalist at his unmarked grave.

III. The Biuro Szyfrów

Work in the cellar. Rejewski's lucky guess about the wires connecting to the entry-disk. Planes, bombs falling. Zygalski, hauling away the wreckage of the train from around the refugees.

Różycki giving advice to his baby son.

A night-time trek through the unknown Pyrenees.

IV. Alan Turing

apple stalk
apple pip
paper tape
gummed strip

daisy petal
knitted glove
sherry bottle stammered laugh

cipher text
decision tree
relay switch
"I see! I see!"

homemade chess set gas mask
bike chain turning Hershey bar

snow on Gable Scharnhorst sunk electronics
mushroom hunt

white noise
Hanslope Park
London Wilmslow
apple stalk

Woman

She thought, at first, that the juice on her lips was sin.
She touched her swollen waist, touched her hips.
She thought that the righteous were thin.

The core and pips accused her from the ground.
She thought that, by eating, she'd made herself unclean.
She thought, and the thought came with a soft hissing sound, that it was her fault, it was irremediable. She did not want to be seen.

It does not say with what name one who walked in the garden late that day called her near, or what he said, as they talked, as he covered her nakedness with an animal skin, that set her free, so that it was his hand she held most tight while she walked the earth.

But it says that she said:

My son, it was with the help of God that I brought you forth.

And it says that she said:

It was God who granted you to me.

Ellen Braende: Dingle Races

Ellen was born in Oslo, Norway and has always been fascinated by horses. She was practising as a graphic designer before moving to Dingle in 1999. Self-taught in her favoured medium of oils, she is inspired by the horse fairs she visits in West Kerry. Her work can be seen in Greenlane Gallery, Dingle www.greenlanegallery.com

Hannah Copley, 22, graduated from the University of Leeds this year, and is about to undertake an MA in Modern to Contemporary Literature. These are her first poems to be published.

Sightseer

I followed your train of thought:
It was blue with six even compartments and those old fashioned windows; pull downs, the ones in the old films that you could put your face out of, feeling Tall and alive as you glided sideways over fields, or saying goodbye to a lover your chin resting on the black ledge.
You shut the window and withdrew
As the train pulled into the city,
Dwarfed by the uneven landscape
Half-seeing, half-watching your own face in the glass.
A translucent being on the tower blocks your eyes were in the buildings watching.
As your train of thought slid away
It had become my own.

Young Woman

I was born first with the face of an old man
But this I can't remember;
The purples and reds and yellows of a new world
And the contact of wet skin to the hot heart of woman.
The cries from heads and tails made us seem like a creature.
A two-headed monster, a screaming coin.

I was born again as a muse
Emerging out of the pain and pride
Of what verse is made of.
Unable to revel in such an awkward minute
Of hip bones, and grey sheets
On a single bed.

I was reborn as a mirror,
The most painful of all my transformations.
In black, in a black car, in a black day
Where everything feels so dark against the paper white Skin that I touched as I dressed you.
Reflecting death is the burden that comes
With knowing you remain.

I opened my eyes once
To the eyes of another
And understood.

I am alive as an oven.
Big as one, overheated, and cooking at a low simmer
The new life within,
That rises like bread or a phoenix
From knowledge and touch and death.
Not quite a cat,
I bask in my reincarnation.

Suzanne Clark: Archie (her beloved horse that lived into his late thirties) – oils on gesso canvas

Rachel Faulkner was born in 1987 and grew up in the Dorset countryside. She studied English Literature at Cardiff University and went on to complete a Masters in the same discipline at the University of Warwick. She now lives in central London, working for a publishing house. She is one of the two chosen Broadsheet poets in the 'Hoofmarks' issue of Agenda.

Blackberry Picking

Out walking in late September, the last stroll before another year away,
and you at home, now working in the office with your father. We carry with us buckets that we fashioned from icecream tubs.
We'd emptied them the night before with spoons and clumps of chocolate spread,
as we had thought to do as children.
The evening sun is warm still and water tracks its way between the hairs along our necks.

Plucking blackberries from the bushes, fat as plums, packed with orbs - swelling black pupils. Not checking for dust or bugs, but with each bucketed fruit, another tasted straight from the stem.

Painted jeans and Wellington boots - children's clothing. We walk slowly down the long road from my house.
We'll reach the end just to come back again.
Mouths bleeding sweet and sticky juice over our lips and chins. Red smiles stuck with seeds between the bottom teeth.

Deer

Tumbling from the path, deep into the thicket, he'd pulled himself, somehow, many metres from the road.
Leaning up against the skinny body of a silver birch
I searched the open eyes, black as polished eight-balls, and lit my first Marlboro in weeks. The smoke's dance, almost in rhythm with his body's twitch.

His face, firm and motionless. His coat and tail fluttering like moth wings. Insects already would have been moving underneath us.
Brought out by the smell of damp hair,
the thump of his heartbeat soaking into the ground with rainwater. I too will tremble in the darkness one day. I too would choose not to go alone.

I stayed until the cigarette had burnt out, until everything had ceased to stir or glow.
Everything except my distant car blinking faintly through the silver birches in the night.

In the mornings we'd break the ice over the pools, buckets, baths. To see them lick the wet tops, great tongues lolling, was fun, but only for a moment,

so we'd take our boots to the hardened water,
thick in cooler dawns, opaque as oak nuts.
At times we'd use spades or broom handles.
You used your fist once, and saw how the cold made it bulbous and pink.
You warmed it in the beet before serving.
Waiting on the gate, heels hooked between steel bars, you leaned in and showed how your hands smelt of beer from the chaff, sweet from the haylage.
In the field the bays chased one another,
teeth nipping as hind legs weaved between empty feed bowls and the piles of hay, steaming.

Gerard Byrne: Killiney Hill

Gerard was born in Dublin and is a self-taught painter. Poetry and Opera inspire him for their emotive qualities, also the French impressionists. Like the latter, he works en plein air. Colour and light are his great challenges. His work can be found in the Greenlane Gallery, Dingle, Co. Kerry, Ireland. www.greenlanegallery.com

Wood Pigeon

Take too coos, taffy.
Take grey plumes and green throat.
Thick moans knocked between leaden oak trees.
Blue water swilled
in garden ponds,
lavender quivers,
fat drum splashes.
Pine needles creak
under drowsy pink feet.

Squirrel

Hands that are like your hands, tucked in neat
between the plates of bark;
the sodden moss; the woody veins.
Voiceless, but hurrying,
scuttling (vertical dances),
makes the tree chatter,
and the leaves loosen and fall.
Then crackling into those brown webbed stars
with gentle fingered paws,
I clear the conkers
my black rippling oyster eyes

Suzanne Clark: Avoca Beach, Australia

Suzanne's work is celebrated especially in Broadsheet 16.

Suzanne's work has been featured in a past Broadsheets. She recently spent a year in New Zealand and was inspired by the landscape there. She has her own studio in Brighton. www.suzanneclark.co.uk

Sarah Sibley is 25 and lives in the Suffolk countryside where she works for a small publishing company. She has had her poems published in Orbis, The Interpreter's House and Obsessed with Pipework. She will be starting an MA in Creative Writing at Lancaster University in the new academic year.

Ten

Some sat close with words
to burn all her ten years.
The flame they hoped would smoke out her illnesses and the diary she kept them in,
the one with the hedgehog cover.
She started eating it and spitting the spines at all the viruses and theories spiralling:
Lips white making her feel like she couldn't be alone with all those children barking and following,
finding school so interesting.
Her lemming anxiety multiplying as playground lorries turned up to dispatch more.

Texas

You try a bed for size
then rise like a baked cake
under spotlights of every kind.
Running through back to back bathrooms and kitchens flipping toilet lids
and collecting plastic fruit.
You imagine the squeeze of shagpile,
two carpet rolls like a giant mangle, then finish up by the samples which have wallpapered every school face and uniform,
every school exercise book
but never a room.

The mechanical man

At the back of his head
I saw a key turning slowly until he stopped speaking and the key froze

and he froze over me.
I saw his eye colour clearly for the first time
and couldn't wind the key.
I savoured like I shouldn't savour but then reality hiccupped and I couldn't hold my breath long enough for the nonsense of his far-away face to go away, along with images of him lost in his own village where there is no key and he's never stopped speaking.
And now he asks me a question but I don't know what I've heard.

Suzanne Clark: Mountain on the Tongariro Crossing, New Zealand

Jen Campbell, 24, is from the North East of England. She graduated from Edinburgh University with an MA in English Literature, and now lives in London. Her poetry and prose have been published in various places, including The Rialto, Poetry London and Short FICTION. She is currently working on a full-length poetry collection and has just finished writing her first short story collection, The Aeroplane Girl. She blogs, interviews authors and writes the 'Weird Things Customers Say in Bookshops' series over on her blog <http://jen-campbell.blogspot.com> .

what he did can be found in genesis

He loved wild things because they matched / how he'd fold girls' hands against / their wallpaper. Against pages of the big book. / Stolen from hotel rooms appearing / like convictions of forgive me for I have. / He put duct tape on his tyres / pulled straight into garages where / his ID wasn't needed./ Another day on the M4. / The hard shoulder made for skidding on. / In the heat he swore blind / there were lasses there. / In the hedgerow running. / Like some theatrics he'd been dragged to see. / Crawling down / on their hands and their knees. / Like they were praying.

Tony O'Connor: Breaking Through

Sofy Bevan, 18, lives in Gloucester and is reading for a degree in English at the University of Exeter. She has won several prizes for her poems, including in 2009 being shortlisted for the Christopher Tower Poetry Competition, Christchurch.

Road-kill

Exhaust-stained canvas stretching for miles decorated with powder-pale fur, tasteful arrangements of puce entrails and a glittering glass eye stares.

Clouds of feathers linger by the road,
some sticking to the crimson oil-slicks.
Crunch of tires grind the bones to powder disturbing the flies and the beetles.

The stench of sun-baked carcass wafts on stifling waves of sickening air.
Their backs arched, mouths silently screaming in a permanent state of terror.

The rain leaches the colour away from the startling palette of death, leaving the canvas blank once again till the artists behind the wheel create.

Gerard Byrne: Vico Road, Killiney, Co. Dublin